To whom it may concern,

There are many unanswered questions about the foxconn facility that is being built in southeast Wisconsin. The first of many is how are they getting this large volume of water from Lake Michigan while seeminly ignoring the great lakes compact. Yet it seems to be a done deal as the pipes and privisons to do so go into the ground as I type this email.

The second question that many people ask is what are they putting into the water they recieve as well as how will they remove or return said water back to Racine public works. Further more what percentage of the water supplied shall be returned and in what condition, if unusable will the Racine public water treatment facility be able to accommodate the increase in volume and effectively be able to treat the water. If not what is the community of Racine going to have to further invest into a water treatment facility.

Third why is it that the water pipeline is already being placed yet no descisions have been made. Is this decision going to ramrodded through the system regardless of community opinion, legalities, or impact on enviroment. Does Foxxconn intend to build a treatment facility on site and if so what is the process to remove the heavy metals and materials used to make LCD screens. Also to what standards will this treatment process be kept and whom will monitor the conditions of the water returned to our community.

Last but not least is what stops other corporations and surrounding communities in other state even from making a water diversion rush once you open the door to such a large consumer of a natural resource. What stops others from demanding water for their manufactoring facility in the millions of gallons per day range and leaning back on well foxconn got it so should I mentality.

Hope to get some answers from someone.
If this goes to an impass it will go to a bought and paid for supreme court that shall duely back the project for thier friend Scott Walker. Im sure all this falls on deaf ear and is a sham to involve the community's that shall pay the price with higher taxes, damaged land, and water to containtmented to use. Racine shall be the next Flint michigan if the DNR DOESNT STEP UP and do its job to protect our resources.

Concerned and irritated taxpayer,
